WHY?

What makes a man turn against his own country and sell secrets to another country? Recently a Royal Navy officer was sentenced to 21 years in prison for selling defense secrets to the Soviet Union at his wife's urging to pay household debts.

The officer, a Sub-Lieutenant, was a 31 year old torpedo expert who had joined the navy as an enlisted man. And graduated at the top of his officer's class. He pleaded guilty to selling naval information to the Russians for the equivalent of $5,980.00. His lawyer said the sentence would be appealed.

In a pretrial statement, the officer said his wife, age 35 had suggested he turn his knowledge of navy secrets into money to pay their household debts. And to buy a new car. His wife fainted when the sentence was passed. She said later: "I shall never know why I wasn't charged as well as my husband. He has taken all the blame because of his love for me and the children." The couple has four children.

The prosecutor said: "This is not a case of the Soviet intelligence service seeking out and suborning a British citizen. According to the accused's own statement, it is a case of a naval officer seeking out the Soviet authorities."

The information on ship manoeuvers, fleet movements and strength and firepower statistics on Western navies, which the lieutenant passed on to the Russians from 1970 until his arrest last August, "had a value to a potential enemy almost beyond price," the prosecutor said.

Navy sources said later that the officer's activities nearly wrecked British sea defense plans made in case of war. The sources said that naval experts had been working on a new plan since the officer's arrest and had almost completed it. Again, according to the sources, the officer gave the Soviet Union precise details about the arming and capacity of British submarines with estimates on where they might be deployed.

What was the reaction in the United States? U.S. intelligence officials tended to minimize the possible impact on American defense planning as a result of this case. "We change our tactics, strategy and plans from time to time to prevent just this sort of thing from happening," a Defense Department source said. "Of course we don't know whether one man might know so much that he could compromise our plans. But I am sure the Royal Navy doesn't know all our plans-just as we don't know all the Royal Navy's plans." Another Pentagon source said it was not clear whether the secrets passed to the Russians involved weapons, such as the Polaris and Poseidon Nuclear submarine missile systems.

Assuming that his wife is telling the truth, this is something additional she said when he began to serve his prison term: "I nagged him into becoming a spy. I was the one who passed on information through the dead letter boxes. I don't think my husband even knew where all of them were. I shall never know why I wasn't charged." She even remarked that her husband was "an incompetent spy." "He did it for me and the children. He never wanted to do it right from the start. I pushed him all the way."

There is one sad fact of life to be kept in mind: There are some people who will do anything for money-especially when they need it very badly. "I was badly overdrawn at the bank," she remarked. "I needed extra money for clothes to enable me to mix with other officers' wives. We had to go to the commander-in-chief's garden party. It lasted an hour and a half. I had to have an outfit for that.

How did she get to the Russians? She first went to the Soviet Embassy in Kensington in February of 1970. It was in the middle of an anti-Soviet demonstration. The police held back the demonstrators to shepherd her through. "I was carrying a letter giving details about my husband," she said. "It was presumed I was handling a petition."

Two weeks later she was invited to a Soviet Embassy party. She took along her son, one of their four adopted children.

"The Russians knew all about me even to the color of the curtains at home," she said. "I had obviously been well checked."

We will have to take a reasonable guess about why the Russians did a thorough job of checking out the would-be spy. It could be that they wanted to be certain that they weren't going to walk into an anti-espionage trap. You want to know who is going to support her and her children while her husband is in jail? That's a good question to ask but just now I don't feel I should be the one to answer it. What bothers me is how can a man who was awarded a sword of honor for being the top officer in his graduating class become a spy?
